Fire's Edge is one part thriller, one part social commentary with a detective novel style and a depth that will surprise you. Siporin's use of fiction offers a forum for public exchange on racism and hatred – the psychological and emotional issues at the root of hate crimes. “You can never walk in another person's skin” Siporin says. “But you can come closer by putting the reader in the skin of fictional characters.” Siporin has called this important work his gift to the community. “Racism stops when we take action, and this book is calling all of us to take a stand against hate.”
